Southwest Airlines * boarding pass

A Southwest Airlines * boarding pass contains a unique set of details tailored to the airline's open-seating and simplified travel model, making it different from most legacy carriers. It begins with the passenger's full name and the confirmation number associated with the reservation, followed by the flight number, date of travel, and the departure and arrival airports listed with their standard IATA codes—such as DAL for Dallas Love Field or DEN for Denver. Because Southwest does not assign seats, the most critical information on its boarding pass is the boarding position, displayed as a combination of a boarding group (A, B, or C) and a number from 1 to 60, for example A23 or C57. This boarding position determines the order in which passengers enter the aircraft and select seats, making it one of the most important elements for travelers who want early access to overhead-bin space or a preferred location. The boarding pass also includes the scheduled departure time, the gate number, and any change notifications issued by the system. A scannable barcode or QR/Aztec code contains encoded ticket data used by airport scanners for security and boarding. Additional information may appear depending on your purchase type—such as EarlyBird Check-In, Anytime, Wanna Get Away, or Business Select—with Business Select often receiving priority boarding at the top of Group A. The pass may also show indicators for special services like “Preboard,” “Family Boarding,” or “Military,” which determine alternative boarding sequences. Mobile versions in the Southwest app display the same information but optimize it for quick scanning and real-time updates, helping passengers stay informed about gate shifts, connection times, and boarding reminders. Whether printed or digital, the Southwest boarding pass serves as the key document guiding you from check-in to the aircraft, structured around the airline's signature open-seating process.
